All,

I have rounded out Allison's comments with some of my own responses to Christine's latest questions. You will see that Allison and I are in 100% agreement regarding Christine's first new question ("Functionally, why is it important to make this statement?"), although I added some important detail. I also replied to Christine's other comments that were otherwise not yet addressed. With regard to Christine's last comment, I assume it applies to the last part of the Landslides section, rather than the first part of the Herbicides section.

Looking forward to an on-call discussion about this (...perhaps on today's manager's call?)

Trivia Fun Fact of the Day:

I learned that Governor Brown's husband works for the U.S. Forest Service (in a data center) and is an avid outdoorsman. The couple has a good track record of keeping their distinct careers far away from their spouse's careers, which seems particularly important at this juncture in state politics.

Christine--

I responded to a few of your comments to hopefully explain where we were coming from on a few of the changes. See yellow highlighted comments.

Thanks folks for your edits to the document. I think it looks good. I did have a few comments/questions which I provided on the clean version that Jayne sent. It may be that the best option to finalize the document is to carve out a time to walk through with you the few comments I had.

I also just talked to Dennis about finalizing this document and having it ready for when the time is right to move forward with engagement with the State on forestry. While things are on hold until things settle a bit about who remains as the Governor's advisor(s), he said that he is eager to see the final document and is ready to reengage at the earliest opportunity. In the meantime, he continues to have conversations and meetings with Dick Pedersen.
